

Executive Director's Report 2002

Michael Brintnall, APSA

It is an honor to provide my first annual report as executive director of the American Political Science Association. The vital signs for APSA are healthy ones: membership at near record levels and growing; a vigorous agenda; new electronic services for members; and a positive financial status. Before recounting these details, and reviewing active and proposed initiatives on our agenda, however, I think it is useful to reflect about different aspects of the field, and about the place of APSA and of the national office in the larger world of political science.

The field of political science has different, somewhat layered structures, of which these four are key: (1) The discipline itself—the content and methodologies of the field, the norms that surround peer review and the integrity of scholarship, and other building blocks for scholarship. (2) The academic and scholarly enterprise of the field—the processes by which the field trains new scholars, manages advancement in the field, establishes outlets for research, undertakes contract research, and builds professional community. The field relies heavily on the cycle of graduate training, job placement, evaluation of scholarly production and teaching performance, etc., as an integrative mechanism. Academic programs use the components of this cycle as a way to learn about each other and as a kind of comparative performance measure. The cycle integrates as well the role of the professional journals, the Annual Meeting, the Association's recruitment services, and other mechanisms by which achievement in the field is shared. (3) The work of the Association itself—encompassing centralizing elements such as the roles of the Council, the presidency, the APSR editor, and the Annual Meeting organizer; integrative elements such as the work of the Status Committees; confederating elements such as the Organized Sections; member interests, which include students, faculty, other scholars, academic departments, and other institutions; infrastructure responsibilities such as advancement of teaching and maintenance of ethical practices; and collaborative work as we partner with other political science associations, institutes, and foundations. (4) The activities of the national office, including maintaining membership, managing the Annual Meeting, running the employment clearinghouse processes, hiring and retaining good people, developing and protecting the publications, staffing committees, and administering myriad program activities.

These all of course are more or less loosely coupled, and they make for a complicated business. Much of importance in political science crosscuts these different structures, making planning, coordination, and even the structures for conversation complex. Clearly we have benefited greatly in political science from initiatives that enhanced this complexity—the growth of organized sections, active outreach to diversify participation in the field, the continued development of specialized associations and groups in the field, the promise offered by a third scholarly journal within APSA, and so forth. These developments have also moved APSA from a sort of pyramidal structure to a much more multicentered, web-like one. This has been a change with enormous implications for how we all work together to develop the field.

It is thus valuable to be sensitive to what holds the many parts of the field of political science together—what we might call the “glue” that helps the various components to adhere—values, activities, and exchanges that keep the field, the enterprise, the Association, and its managing office somewhat synchronized and reinforcing—especially as the complexity of our systems has increased. These integrative processes have many dimensions and work in many ways. There are five that I think are critical: (a) common meeting grounds; (b) the placement market; (c) integrated access to scholarship; (d) organizational partnerships and collaboration; and (e) curriculum. Each of these areas is a way to bring people from different aspects of the field of political science together—and should they become weakened, they weaken the whole field of political science, not just the Association or other entities involved. There is no orthodoxy, on the other hand, in how to keep them strong—but we have a collective interest in assuring their strength. As you will see from the details of APSA activities reported here, we are seeking to be attentive in all of these areas.

Common meeting grounds refer to ways people interact, learn, and discuss with each other across all aspects of the field. The Annual Meeting continues to be a healthy and vibrant setting for this—bringing together panels from Organized Sections, divisions, and numerous related groups. We hope, as well, the new journal Perspectives on Politics will function as a kind of intellectual meeting ground, by emphasizing peak scholarship that cuts across fields or integrates diverse topics. A preprint and conference paper server—a kind of electronic commons for work in progress—is another idea.

The placement market refers to the structures we have in place to assure that all job listings are known and open to all interested and qualified political scientists, and that it works smoothly, transparently, and openly with low transaction costs. We are working on proposals to make job listings more readily available, to assure that job listings cover the full range of academic and applied opportunities for political scientists, and to coordinate listing services and on-site conference placement services and listings with other political science associations.

Integrated access to scholarship is intended to assure that scholarship at all stages of its development is readily and widely available to scholars in all subsets of political science and across our many institutional structures, i.e., that we resist as best as possible a balkanization of our work. The availability of APSR in conjunction with many other political science journals in an integrated search through JSTOR is a key illustration of progress on this. As I noted, the new Perspectives on Politics journal is intended to support work that integrates different subfields. Another idea under development is the creation of a web-based preprint and paper server that could provide common access to scholarship that is not yet formally published—preprints, conference papers, institute reports, and so forth. We need to build a commons here even if users wish to graze only on small parts of it, or for different things.

The organizational geography of political science is increasingly complex. Political scientists typically belong to many associations and groups within the field, and increasingly on campuses are aligned with many centers and institutes as well as, or instead of, a political science department. The glue for the field will not realistically come from actions of a single association or traditional departmental structures, but from collaborations and partnerships among them. We have made some small steps toward this end, but need to think about it in more depth. The preprint and paper server described above could be managed as a collaborative, for example, to offer access to conference papers from numerous conferences in the field.

Finally, of course, the curriculum in our graduate programs is central to the ways in which common understandings in political science and capacities for integrative work will develop. To this end, the naming of a Task Force on Graduate Education in Political Science, proposed by President-elect Theda Skocpol and approved by the APSA Council, is a significant development. The goal is a report about excellent practices, important issues, and suggestions for innovations—with a look at, among other things, “How can graduate programs balance and ensure mastery of a variety of literatures and methodologies, while still respecting the specialized expertise necessary for any one approach?”

Integrative actions are not the only important ones on the agenda, and there is much else underway at APSA in support of other key goals. The American Political Science Review is under new editorial direction by Lee Sigelman at George Washington University, and continues in its efforts to encourage, identify, and disseminate the very best in scholarship in the field. President Robert Putnam has convened a discussion group on ways to enhance the public presence of political science—to assure that our scholarship and our scholars are engaged, as appropriate, in key public issues of the times. Efforts to identify, protect, and increase resources for political science scholarship are leading activities for APSA: we participate in leadership roles in the Consortium of Social Science Associations and in the National Humanities Alliance addressing NSF, NEH, and other agency budgets and practices. We have joined with Public Citizen and the American Historical Association in the presidential records lawsuit seeking to assure scholars’ timely access to presidential papers. Our diversity initiatives continue as well, with examples including support for the Ralph Bunche Institute, continuation of the Minority Identification Project, planning on new funding strategies for Minority Fellowships to be sure resources actually reach minority graduate students in ways that are of net additional value to them in their studies, and so forth. And there is increasing attention to ways we can provide mentoring support to emerging minority and women graduate students and professors, and bolster family-friendly working conditions for our faculty. You will hear more about these latter two initiatives very soon.

Additionally, there are some areas where I think we can press further in our activities, and the APSA office will be developing some ideas for consideration by the Council. One of these is our support for teaching, and we will be looking at ways in which we might be able to develop a regular conference on teaching political science, or some other enhanced means for political scientists to present, discuss, and learn about teaching issues in the field. This topic would certainly include attention to ways to use new electronic and distance technologies in teaching. I also feel that we have not been fully supporting, or engaging, academic departments in APSA procedures, and I am looking forward to exploring ways that departmental memberships in the Association can play a more active role. And as well, we can do more in the international arena—certainly in liaison with and support for international travel and scholarly exchange, but perhaps more significantly in the leadership we can provide in support of building national and regional political science associations, and where apt, in support of building political science departments. I'll report more on the progression of these ideas in future report, and as with every theme here, we welcome everyone's comments and contributions.

Jennifer Hochschild of Harvard University has been named the inaugural editor of the Association's new journal, Perspectives on Politics. The new journal aims to fill the gap between refereed political science journals focused mainly on individual research, and the popular press focused on "politics." Articles in Perspectives intend to enable members of different subfields of political science to speak to one another, and with knowledgeable people outside the discipline, on issues of common interest. To aid her in identifying and shaping articles that will speak to an interdisciplinary audience, Hochschild has named five associate editors: Henry Brady, University of California at Irvine; William Galston, University of Maryland; Atul Kohli, Princeton University; Paula McClain, Duke University; and Jack Snyder, Columbia University. The first issue of Perspectives will arrive in your mailbox next March.

Preparations are already underway to complete the successful Centennial Campaign in 2003 and to prepare the new study Center in Washington to receive its first resident and visiting scholars in September 2003. Due to the generosity of Association members and friends, the Campaign's general and restricted endowments have either reached or are on the verge of reaching their goals. Indeed, several funds—including the Artinian, Miller, and Volcker Endowments—have exceeded their original goals and will be able to expand the level of support they will provide to scholars. The Campaign has already raised $2.2 million in pledges, gifts, and transfers, and has benefitted from additional investment earnings over the past several years.

During its final stage, the Centennial Campaign will concentrate on increasing the level of unrestricted endowment support to provide the Association with the financial flexibility needed to be able to adapt to the changing circumstances and needs of future generations of political scientists. Program development for the Centennial Center will also figure prominently in the coming year. As originally conceived, the Association's new study center is to spawn a colloquia series addressing new frontiers and controversies in political science research; workshops dealing with substantive issues in comparative and international politics; resource development projects focusing on classroom instruction, projects promoting civic education; and a multi-year program concentrating on the issue of inequality and politics. APSA members are strongly encouraged to participate in giving direction to these undertakings and to work with the Association to raise the external support needed to make them a reality. Please submit your ideas and proposals to Rob Hauck at rhauck@apsanet.org.

The 2002 Annual Meeting in Boston is expected to equal and possibly surpass the attendance record of 6633 set by the 1998 meeting in the same city. The 2001 meeting in San Francisco challenged the record, with attendance of 6492. The upcoming Boston meeting involves over 3,000 presenters and includes a record number of poster presenters, as well as the new poster presentation format, or colloquia. Overall acceptance rates for the 2002 Meeting are 53% for organized panels, 37% for papers (excluding poster sessions), and 50% for papers and poster sessions. The Association is also gearing up for the Centennial Celebration and events during the 2003 Annual Meeting in Philadelphia. Events are being organized to honor and highlight former presidents, the fiftieth anniversary of the Congressional Fellowship Program, Teaching and Undergraduate Education, and the future of the profession with receptions celebrating diversity, graduate students, and nontenured faculty in the profession.

APSA membership is at its highest level in five years and has only been higher two years (1995 and 1997) since the mid-1970s when we began keeping data. We've experienced most of that growth in the professional and student member categories, which bodes well for the future of the Association. Our program to provide sponsored memberships to first- and second-year Ph.D. students has been highly successful, with 649 students receiving a complimentary year of membership (with costs shared between APSA and the students' departments) since the program was launched at the end of 2000. Personnel Service Newsletter and PSNonline subscriptions are up, and we're on track for a year of record participation in the individual access program that provides access to the online archives of APSR, PS, and other selected political science journals through JSTOR. A significant service we've added for members within the past year has been MyAPSA, which allows members to log in as themselves and provides easy access to all the online services to which they are entitled, lists a year's worth of financial transactions with APSA, displays membership expiration date, includes access to our secure online membership form, and allows members to verify and update all the data in their membership records, including their listings in Directory of Members Online, which is updated daily. In the coming year, we're looking forward to adding more components to MyAPSA, including Directory of Department Chairs Online and Directory of Political Science Faculty Online, both of which will be updated daily; improving our paper and email renewal notices; the launch of Perspectives on Politics; and instituting some creative ideas for member recognition in conjunction with our upcoming centennial. If you have any suggestions or ideas for the membership team or any questions about your membership, please feel free to contact us at membership@apsanet.org.

APSA finances remain strong. We ended last year with a significant operating surplus, and have projected a modest one for this year as well. The market value of APSA invested funds is of course facing strains from the current adverse stock market of which we are all well aware. But we use these funds conservatively, are not forced to alter any programming because of short-term market forces, and have over the long run benefited greatly from the decisions to invest for greatest long-term growth.

APSA as an association and as an office is blessed with good people. This has indeed been noted often. One is no more aware or appreciative of it as when one joins the organization with fresh eyes and expectations. I can affirm that it is indeed so. The leadership and attentiveness from President Putnam and all the members of the Administrative Committee and the Executive Council in a difficult year of transition to a new executive director and to a new journal and new editors have been remarkable. This group along with staff and many attentive members has kept the Association work moving ahead smoothly and has continued the flow and vetting of new ideas. Robert J-P. Hauck has served in really two full-time jobs during this transition, working as acting executive director as while fulfilling his many other APSA responsibilities. He did this seamlessly and splendidly. And the contributions of Catherine Rudder will be with us for a long time. She and her predecessors have provided for us an Association rich in resources, staffed with imaginative and dedicated people, and stocked with well-conceived projects. The field, the enterprise, and the Association will benefit for many years. It is a privilege to follow in this position.
